

- Main
- News
- Features
- Programs
- Community
- Weather
- Video
- Audio
- Contact

Friday February 10, 2012

• Other Regions

Comments@Recommend2 |

The North's Toll Highway

A ruling that would have forced Northwestel to divulge the fees it charges competitors to use its telecommunications infrastructure has been put on hold.

Northwestel owns the only connectivity service linking the North to the South, and other companies have long argued the rates it charges are unfair and unreasonably high.

Last month, the Canadian Radio-television Telecommunications Commission ordered Northwestel to explain how it determines pricing for other companies that want to use its information highway.

Instead, Northwestel has proposed a new service at a lower rate.

That's not exactly what Dean Proctor was hoping for.

He's the Chief Development Officer for SSI Micro, the Yellowknife-based company that filed the complaint against Northwestel.

LISTEN (pop up player)

Categories: Past Episodes

ww 1/4